● 1.8 MILLION NEW HOMES NEEDED FOR IMMIGRANTS

Sir Andrew Green's Migration Watch organisation reports that 1.8 million new homes will be required to accommodate the flood of new migrants to Britain. The independent think tank has based its report on findings from Professor Dave King, director of the Population and Housing Research Group at Anglia Polytechnic University.

The report says that housing planners, particularly in the south east, have grossly underestimated the amount of new housing stock needed to cater for the levels of immigration over the next two decades. They have been working on outdated levels of 65,000 people entering the UK each year. Yet the Home Office's own figures (which are almost certainly underestimated) for 2001 show in excess of 172,000 for that year alone. So instead of the 740,000 new homes that the Government predicted should be built between 2001 and 2021, the figure now approaches 2 million.

This will lead to the environmental devastation of southern England as new housing schemes are built on Greenfield sites, as new roads, retail and leisure complexes and transport infrastructure are built to supply the new estates.

There will be more 'white flight' to East Anglia, the South West, Wales, Cumbria – and sunny Spain, but many of them are so brainwashed that they will vehemently deny that they are trying to escape from the asylum flood.

● WHEN COUNCILLORS' FRAUD IS NOT NEWS

Kumar Murshid, one of Ken Livingstone's closest advisors, is one of three councillors suspended by London's Tower Hamlets Council following an investigation by the Met's Fraud Squad. It centres on claims that thousands of pounds of British taxpayers' money has gone missing from organisations supposed to help the Bangladeshi community. Among the several organisations the London training agency Millennium Advanced Technology Training (MATT) has received more than £2m. Its Chief Executive, one Abu Ahmed, was arrested by police on July 8th and charged with conspiracy to defraud funding organisations and allegations of false accounting.

Kumar is Ken Livingstone's Cabinet Advisor on Regeneration and Asian Affairs and Chairman of the Stepney Youth Action Scheme, as well as being a Tower Hamlets Councillor and a founding chairman of the National Assembly Against Racism.

You would think that all this would have made national press news. It would probably have done if they had been Tory Councillors and certainly would have done if they had been BNP! The only reports were two inches or so in London's Evening Standard and the Guardian. The rest of the media were too occupied with reporting the mundane, the inane and the culturally profane.

● COMMON SENSE FROM THE CHIEF RABBI

Dr Jonathan Sacks, the UK's Chief Rabbi, last year got himself into hot water with some members of the Jewish community with his comments in the Guardian (August 2002) that Israel was adopting a stance incompatible with the ideals of Judaism in its conflict with the Palestinians. He has now said in regard to the flood of economic migrants: "The present system – beset by delays, humiliations, hardships and human traffickers – cannot continue. The pressure of sheer numbers of asylum seekers in the 21st century will force the West to develop new policies." – Sunday Telegraph, July 6, 2003

Another thought provoking comment he made in the same interview was: "Multiculturalism has made it far more difficult for new waves of immigrants to feel at home, or to develop a sense of pride in being British". This was, he said, because there was no longer a national identity here to integrate into.

● BOLSTERING BLACK BARRISTERS

The Crown Prosecution Service last month launched a £4.5million scholarship scheme which aims to bolster the number of black and ethnic minority barristers and lawyers. It is claimed that Britain's present justice system does not reflect the ethnic diversity of society.

Harriet Harman, Solicitor General, feminist and multiculturalist extraordinaire, said the initiative would help to turn the legal profession from one that is dominated by white middle class white men to one that is more reflective of all the people it serves.

We say it will create hundreds if not thousands of extra 'human rights' law firms eager for access to the 'asylum', 'racial litigation' gravy trains.

● £120M FALSE EU SUBSIDIES

Most European Union member states have fraudulently claimed £120 million of agricultural subsidies, according to a European Commission inquiry, whose findings were announced last month.

The main offenders were France, Greece and Italy. Only Britain, Denmark, Holland, Belgium and Finland were found to have implemented the correct controls required by the Common Agricultural Policy. Some of the farmers had been claiming for "cattle that don't exist, crops that are never grown, or land that isn't farmed", said Neil Parish, a Conservative MEP.

This EU crooks' free lunch is funded by £28 billion agricultural subsidies each year, which is half the EU's overall budget.

Rats Joining a BBC Sinking Ship

Britain's support for the United States in the invasion of Iraq will go down in history as the defining moment when the British public began to see that Tony Blair's lust for power far exceeded any ideological beliefs. The outcome of the military, but not yet political defeat of Saddam, also led to a new low water mark in the public's respect for the integrity of the BBC.

We are not fooled for one moment by the so-called war between the Government and the BBC over the inability to find the weapons of mass destruction (WMD) and particularly those that "would be ready for deployment in 45 minutes". It is all a game that both sides are playing. The traditionally left-wing, anti-government caucus that controls the BBC must justify its anti-war stand. Tony Blair and his mouthpiece, Alastair Campbell, play the game of blaming their own failings on the "media", and the BBC in particular. Caught up in this game was a political innocent; a scientist of great integrity, Dr David Kelly. He said in an e-mail to a friend: "I'm haunted by many dark actors playing games". He was hounded by the Government side as being the BBC's source of information that exposed the claim that Iraq's WMDs could be ready for use in 45 minutes as a complete fabrication. And Dr Kelly was then betrayed by Andrew Gilligan, the BBC journalist leading the attack on the Government's duplicity over Iraq and accusing them of 'sexing up' the dossier on Iraqi weapons. The only escape that Dr Kelly could find was to take his own life.

Those who control the incestuous organisation that the BBC has become are all left-wing. Gavyn Davies, the Chairman, and the recently appointed director-general Greg Dyke are not only Labour Party supporters but have made substantial donations to the Party. But that does not mean that they support Tony Blair and his now shrinking number of New Labour cronies. They are old fashioned Socialists. It would appear that so is Andrew Gilligan. When he was a student at Cambridge in the mid-90s he worked as the University Labour Party's campaign boss in its 1995 student union election campaign.

Writing in the Daily Telegraph July 23rd a fellow ex-student, Nick Forbes, says: "He was ruthless and highly efficient, and was particularly keen on tight control of the media."

For blowing Dr Kelly's cover, the Sun newspaper came out with a front page heading calling Andrew Gilligan "a rat". We would suggest that in view of the fading public respect for the BBC this is the first recorded case of a rat joining a sinking ship. And some might add that Greg Dyke was the first 'rat' to set this fashion. Gilligan, Greg Dyke, et al symbolise the corporate triumphalism of the BBC that so infuriates the licence-paying public.

Eoghan Harris, a political columnist with the Irish Sunday Independent writes:

"The BBC is the big issue in the Iraq dossier affair. Like Iraq itself, it needs to be liberated from fundamentalists and ideologues and returned to those who love fair play – which includes the free play of ideas."

His latter point is particularly relevant in view of the BBC's elimination of the BNP voice from its much heralded TV programme on asylum seekers

THE LIES ABOUT THE WAR

Meanwhile back in Iraq thousands of American and British soldiers are having to sweat it out (literally), seeing their comrades being killed by militant Iraqis, three months after the conflict was supposed to have ended. Every issue on which the BNP opposed the attack on Iraq has become more and more justified. Yet the powers that rule America, with Bush as its current mouthpiece, now threaten Iran and Syria with the same treatment. As with the attack on Iraq, the reason is to strengthen the US control over Middle East oil and to placate the biblical empire building dreams of Sharon's Israel.

In Parliament Blair said that Iraq's oil revenues should be put in a trust fund for the Iraqi people administered through the UN. Instead Britain co-sponsored a Security Council resolution that gave the US and UK control over Iraq's oil revenues. There is no UN-administered trust fund and deductions are continuing to be made from Iraq's oil earnings to pay in compensation for the invasion of Kuwait in 1990.

As for the now notorious claim that Iraq could deploy weapons of mass destruction in 45 minutes, this was based on a single source, said to be a serving Iraqi officer. He has not been produced since the war.

Similarly, two thirds of Americans and many Britons believed the lie that Saddam – nasty bastard that he was – was part responsible for the September 11 attacks on the Twin Towers. This was based on a supposed meeting in Prague between Mohammed Atta, leader of the September 11 hijackers, and an Iraqi intelligence official. Czech intelligence has since stated that the Iraqi's contact could not have possibly been Atta, who was proved to be somewhere else at the time.

Finally, in our contention that the war was a needless loss of British and American servicemen's lives – and that of Iraqi men, women and children, let us look at the claim that Iraq still had vast stocks of chemical and biological weapons from the first Gulf War – enough to kill the whole world, it was said more than once. These could be sprayed from pilotless aircraft anywhere in the world! Experts pointed out that apart from mustard gas, Iraq never had the technology to produce materials with a shelf-life of 12 years, the time between the two wars. All such chemical agents would have deteriorated to the point of uselessness years ago.

BNP Chairman Nick Griffin says of the BNP's objective:

IT IS MORE THAN A POPULAR PROTEST

"Yes, I'm voting for you this time." The man standing in his doorway was another definite 'Yes' voter to add to the canvass returns in a recent election campaign. But as I thanked him and marked a 'Y' on the electoral register, he made a further comment: "Mind you, I don't want you to win. It'd be a disaster if you lot got in."

Needless to say, this apparent gap between his stated intention to vote BNP and his opinion of our party was so great that I asked him to explain, which he duly did. He didn't want us to win because he believed that our lack of experience in council affairs might cause problems, and that our pro-white policies could deepen tensions between the town's majority and its Asian minority. But he wanted us to do well because "it'll make the other lot sit up and take notice. It'll stop them taking us for granted, and that way they'll stop treating us as second class citizens."

I could have countered in various ways: Our new councillors' lack of experience means they wouldn't know how to pull the pocket-filling fiddles that other parties' councillors often use, even if they wanted to. How our candidates know that, if elected, they'll be under such intense hostile scrutiny that they'll have to work twice as hard as anyone else. Or, the fact that racist attacks in Burnley fell by 53% in the six months after our first councillors were elected.

But canvassers aren't there to convert people, merely to break any stereotype they may have about "BNP morons in big boots" and to identify our supporters. And, in any case, he clearly meant what he said about voting for us, and the only thing that counts is the cross in the right box, not the reason it gets put there. So I told him he was absolutely right about high BNP votes making the others sit up and take notice, thanked him again and moved on to the next door (carefully shutting his gate behind me!)

"GIVE THEM A FRIGHT"

Not long after, in the run-up to the May elections, I had another slightly surprising conversation, this time with a thoroughly decent man who was considering standing for us. His prime concern was, again, the way in which we native Britons have been turned into second-class citizens in our own country. And he too had come to the conclusion that the best way to fight this trend is to mobilise a strong electoral protest in favour of the BNP. "If we give them a big enough fright they'll have to let in fewer asylum seekers and stop all this positive discrimination nonsense." Then came the surprising bit: That, to him, would be enough.

Well, it would of course be a start. If people want to treat us as a stick with which to beat Blair and Blunkett it's better than nothing, and the idea that such a protest can bear fruit is quite correct. Look, for example, at the halting of asylum dispersal programmes in places like Blackburn, Burnley and Oldham. Or at the way in which wards which produce big BNP votes suddenly shoot to the top of the list for regeneration and improvement grants. Labour councils in particular are increasingly quick off the mark when it comes to trying to buy voters back with their own money. Even the Commission for Racial Equality responded to our successes in the last general election by announcing that it will henceforth take up the cases of working class white males who are the victims of discrimination.

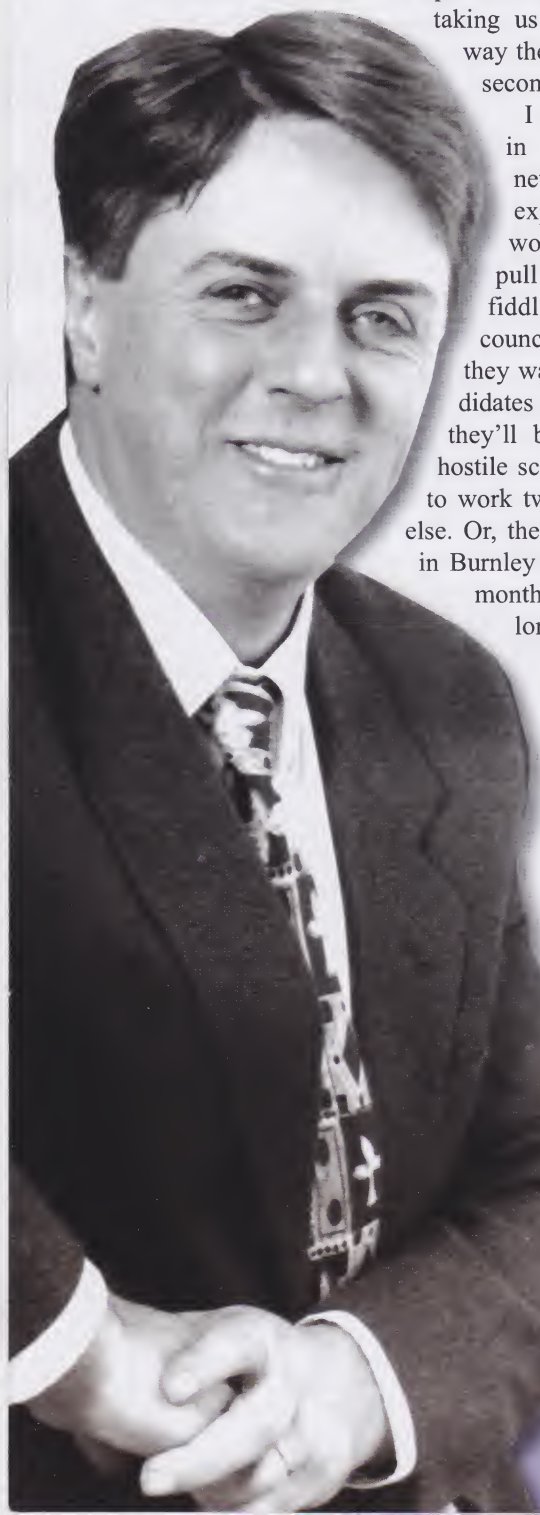

Furthermore, it is already a common complaint among Guardianistas that New Labour, particularly David Blunkett, is "clearing the way for the BNP" by adopting tough anti-asylum rhetoric, thereby legitimising our position at the same time as raising expectations which no government committed to remaining in the EU can possibly fulfil. "The Government is dancing to the BNP's tune," they fret, "the racists are dictating Government policy."

At present, of course, this is true in terms of rhetoric only, save in the case of the high profile pre-election deportation of a small number of Afghans. But there is no doubt that fresh examples of rising support for the BNP would force Blair & Co to go further.

TEMPORARY IMPROVEMENT

The best example of a liberal-left Establishment being forced into a relatively radical policy change on this issue is at present Holland, where the temporary success of the List Forteyn led the mainstream parties to impose extremely tight restrictions on asylum claims and benefits, with the result that the wave of asylum applications which was swamping the country has been cut to a trickle. Forteyn's 'party' is now nearly as dead as its assassinated founder, but it has at least led to a drastic reduction in the speed at which the Dutch were becoming a minority in their own country.

Now, we can't do anything about how our present rulers respond to the BNP 'threat'. But it is absolutely vital that every single party activist understands this point: Making them go 'Dutch' is not enough. Forcing our Masters to slow down the rate at which their genocidal multi-culti 'experiment' is destroying Britain and the British is not enough. Gaining a few more years before our children or grandchildren shift from being an oppressed majority into being an oppressed and brutalised minority is not enough.

ST – IT'S A REVOLUTION IN THOUGHT

Look again at the example of Holland. True, asylum applications have fallen drastically, but 'legal' immigration is continuing. The birth rate of Holland's already huge non-European population is still several times that of the indigenous Dutch whose ancestors created not just their civilisation but the very land now being steadily taken over by millions of 'others'.

Slowing down the rate of change has bought a bit more time, but unless something significantly more radical than the List Forteyn is built and propelled to power, the white, Christian nation whose struggle for freedom from Spanish tyranny is one of the heroic highpoints of European history, will be replaced by a mongrelised Third World Islamic theocracy.

Sadly, the same is true in Britain. Even if future BNP successes were to force the Government to stop asylum seeking altogether, on present birth rate and 'legal' immigration trends the native English, Scots, Welsh and Irish of our islands are doomed to become the minority in what is, in historical terms, the blink of an eye. Even without any more asylum seekers, unless we turn things around, the Book of England in particular has only a few tragedy-filled pages left.

"HIDEOUSLY WHITE"

Partly this is a reflection of the aims and twisted values of our liberal-left 'elite', where the problem is exemplified by two individuals: Greg Dyke and Jack Straw. Dyke is the anti-white racist who heads the BBC, one of the most powerful, sophisticated and ruthless brainwashing machines in the history of the world. He gave us all a glimpse of his sick, self-hating crypto-Trotskyite mentality when he complained bitterly that the BBC is "hideously white." If that's what he says in public, one dreads to speculate on what he thinks – and schemes to do – in private, though an hour watching BBC children's programmes should give you all too clear an idea.

Foreign Secretary Jack Straw, meanwhile, revealed the totalitarian snarl behind New Labour's pinkish mask when he responded to Robin Evans' BNP by-election victory in 'his' constituency of Blackburn by boasting that "We will not let this vote stop us build a multi-racial society in Britain."

Permit me to translate this comment into real English: "We don't give a damn what you peasants think. We're turning your country into a foreign place whether you like it or not. So keep on paying your taxes and shut up."

This mentality is deeply ingrained not just in the present Government and the parliamentary 'opposition' parties, but also among the people running the broadcast media, and the upper echelons of the police force, civil service, churches and the education system. While the average Brits have spent thirty or forty years enjoying the material benefits of the consumer society, our country has been subjected to a rolling ideological coup d'état which has seen the takeover of every institution of any significance by cultural Marxists.

However much of a popular protest we mobilise against the End Game stages of their phased destruction of our identity, freedoms and culture, if it gets no further than the protest stage it will fail. Yes, we might make them "sit up and take notice," but our Masters aren't allowing the asylum flood and anti-white discrimination because such things are unavoidable laws of nature; they allow them because they hate this country and its native peoples, and they want to destroy us.

Look at the Conservative response to the asylum crisis. It's not "this is a tidal wave of immigration that is going to dispossess our children, therefore it must be stopped." Rather, it's "so many are coming in that the public are turning to the BNP. We need to cut the numbers so people go back to sleep while we can carry on building our multi-racial society."

This conscious ideological anti-white agenda shared by our Masters is so deeply ingrained that there isn't the slightest possibility that we can force them to change direction permanently, rather than making the temporary cosmetic changes required to send the public back to sleep.

US OR THEM?

No! The only way we can stop our Masters getting rid of Britain and the British is for us to get rid of them. We don't need a protest party, we need a political, cultural and economic revolution. Not a Banana Republic revolution with bullets and lynch mobs, just a traditional British-style Glorious Revolution where the will of the people prevails over that of an unrepresentative tyranny, and then puts into place such sweeping changes that there can never be any going back to the bad old days.

This new constitutional and economic settlement will come through the ballot box and – in due course – mass ‘People Power’ demonstrations. And it must be carried through for the benefit of the British people as a whole, rather than the banks, the City and the liberal aristocracy who came out on top last time around, though these are subjects to be expanded on elsewhere.

For now, let us return to the other reason why it is not enough just to think in terms of pressuring our existing Masters into being a bit fairer to us ordinary Brits – reducing the rate at which we are taxed to pay for our own dispossession, making the police treat racist attacks on us seriously, and so on. It is summed up best in the photographs which appear in the Daily Mail every couple of months, when another three or four rusting freighters laden to the gunwales with Middle Easterners and Africans wallow across the Mediterranean and manage to beach their battered hulls on the shores of Italy or France, before their human cargo heads north.

As you know, such scenes are only the tip of the iceberg; there is a vast and endless supply of desperate humanity in the failing states of the Third World — their own economies wrecked by incompetence, corruption and exploitation by the international financial system — for whom the white world in general and Britain in particular are an irresistible magnet.

Even if our present Masters suddenly decided that multiculturalising us out of existence isn’t a good idea after all, the immigration tide would keep flowing of its own accord. The steps needed to stop – let alone reverse – it are far too great for there to be the faintest chance of the Blairs, Kennedys and Duncan-Smiths of this world ever daring to take them. As already noted, it would mean withdrawing from the European Union for a start, but many other sacred cows would have to be slaughtered as well, and it simply isn’t going to happen.

TWIN DANGER

Faced with the twin danger of a liberal-left elite which hates its subjects, and the tidal wave of immigration engulfing the entire West, merely getting a few councillors – or even several thousand councillors – elected will not be enough to pull our people back from their present collision course with disaster. ‘Equal rights for whites’ is a very good campaign slogan when it comes to maximising votes, but even taking local power and turning it into a reality in places like Blackburn and Burnley, Sandwell and Stoke won’t be enough. We are not here to establish temporary oases of justice and then watch as demographic changes see them voted out of existence ward by ward. We don’t want a few shrinking ‘English reservations’, we want our country back!

So, as I’ve already said, the only choice to be made is whether our Masters get rid of us, or whether we, the ordinary British, get rid of them. This being the case, it answers the question raised implicitly by the two people mentioned at the start of this article. Are we just here to reform the system, or to change it completely? The answer, of course, is that we are not here to reform things, to slow down the rate of our national decline, or to make it a little less painful.

We are not here to save our Masters from the consequences of their own folly and the way they have lost contact with reality and ordinary people. Of course we delight in every little victory when a BNP community campaigner forces a council department to do something for a local resident who had previously gone years without anyone lifting a finger, but we are not here primarily to ease the lot of a lucky few while the vast majority continue to sink into the status of hewers of wood, drawers of water and payers of taxes for our Masters and their pet ‘minorities’.

RAISING THE TEMPERATURE

Of course BNP councillors must make every possible effort to put an end to individual injustices afflicting their constituents, but it mustn’t end there. Our primary political objective whenever we come across such injustice is not to end it – thus giving temporary relief to one individual or family – but to expose it. The aim must be to raise public awareness of what is going on, in order to gain the extra supporters, members and activists we need to get us into a position where we can deal with the disease, rather than merely treating a few of its symptoms.

Our aim must not be to protect the public from the consequences of continuing to vote for the old parties – or not voting at all – but to educate them in those consequences. We are, in a nutshell, propagandists against the system, rather than social workers for it.

Let us leave to the Tories and the UKIPers the role of trying to put sticking plasters over the gaping, festering sore that is multi-culti Britain. Our job isn’t to make it work a bit less unfairly, but to discredit and dismantle the entire edifice of treason and ethno-cultural destruction.

This is not a call to ‘take it out’ on individual members of ethnic minorities, or even on the traitor politicians who have let so many in and set them up above those of us whose ancestors worked, and died, for this country. There is nothing to be gained from attacking individuals when an entire system is to blame.

Nor am I saying that it is a realistically achievable aim to reverse the tide completely. Perhaps a worldwide change in attitudes – an understanding that the separate races and cultures of Mankind are so precious and fragile that nothing that threatens them can be accepted by decent people of any race – might one day alter this present reality, but until it does we must settle for the best we can get, rather than making fools of ourselves by crying for the moon.

But it is realistic to work to turn the British National Party from a repository for protest votes into a potential party of government. A government that will halt all further immigration and – by consent and compensation – send the flow into reverse, and repeal every last ‘law’ which has restricted our traditional freedoms of speech and association or led to discrimination against the native peoples of our islands. A government which will assess the injustices of recent decades and put into operation policies designed to right all those wrongs.

This is our fundamental aim. Anything which brings the day when we are in a position to make it happen is good. Anything which holds back that day is bad. There are many things which fit into the latter category: Apathy; juvenile extremism; cowardice, and – as pointed out in this article – a lack of clarity as to our eventual goal and the tactics and strategy which will take us there.

I hope that a careful reading of this article will provide our key people with that clarity. There’s no need to shout about it. Let’s just get on with the job, because we haven’t got long.

BNP Red White & Blue Family Festival

16th-17th August in SAWLEY, Lancashire

Red White & Blue

The biggest BNP event of the year. This time with funfair rides for children and adults. The BNP's Red-White-Blue just keeps on getting bigger and better! Sponsorships are being accepted for all facilities – funfair rides, big top, marquees, toilets. You name it, you can sponsor it! All cheques made payable to the Trafalgar Club PO Box 14, Welshpool, Powys SY21 0WE

The fourth annual Red-White-and-Blue Family Festival will be held at the same stunningly beautiful location as last year. All BNP members, and their friends, relatives and guests are very welcome to attend the biggest and best event of the patriotic calendar.

The latest news that world famous comedian Bernard Manning will be doing a 50 minute live set at 10.30 pm on the Saturday evening is sure to push the attendance even higher and we expect the media to get quite excited about this. They'll accuse him of being a foul-mouthed racist, but to most folk it will be just a bit of a laugh.

The site is very easy to find, just off and visible from the main A59 near Sawley, a few miles from Clitheroe and Skipton. The M6 is only a matter of minutes away, so it's an easy journey from pretty much anywhere in the country.

There'll be old friends and new, children's games, political events, music and entertainment, spectacular fireworks, food and drink, competitions, sideshows, and much, much more. There's something for everyone (except the likes of Tony Blair and his asylum seeker friends!) at the Red-White-and-Blue.

Each BNP region will have a stall/display of traditions/culture/political activities in their own region.

The camping and caravan pitches will be open from Friday afternoon on the 15th, and an informal social event will be held on Friday evening for those who want to come early.

Please send an SAE to PO Box 14, Welshpool, SY21 0WE for details of self-booking B&B accommodation.

All-weekend tickets (no reduction for single days) on the gate will be:- Family ticket £15 i.e. single adult plus children or two adults (of different sexes!) with any number of their children up to 18 yrs old; Single adult ticket £12.50.

Bought in advance tickets are £12 Family or £10 Single. Please make cheques/POs payable to 'Trafalgar Club' and send with SAE to PO Box 14, Welshpool, Powys, SY21 0WE.

Volunteers with skills, talents or offers of help should call 0870 7576 267.

Eternal vigilance – the price of democracy

The BNP must be on its guard against Lib-Lab-Con postal vote fraud, says Bruce Davidson

The stunning BNP election victories during the past couple of years have clearly terrified the Government – to such an extent that the Establishment has been using Zimbabwe-style voting fraud to combat democratic change.

The old parties are of course no strangers to electoral fraud. Late last year, for example, two former Lib Dem and Labour councillors were jailed for attempted vote rigging. Ray Race, a former Labour councillor for Havant, Hampshire, was sentenced to four months for 15 counts of forgery of postal and proxy votes and two counts of perverting the course of justice.

In the same trial, at Guildford Crown Court, former Lib Dem Councillor Michael Hayward received two months for seven counts of forgery of postal votes and one count of forging a nomination paper.

Shortly before this year's local elections, the BBC's website reported a row in Brighton over a Labour Party newsletter which indicated the party had examined a "sample" of postal votes which were being opened and checked by council officials. Labour subsequently back-peddled, saying it was referring only to overall numbers of votes received, not the individual party vote. However, this story has disturbing similarities to an incident in Oldham during the 2002 local election. A BBC correspondent on election night reported that Labour was "confident" the BNP would not break through in Oldham. In fact, the BNP's Roy Goodwin came within 91 votes of winning a seat, so it is unlikely that this 'confidence' could have come from straightforward canvas returns, which would have predicted a very close result. Did the party of Government have access to another source of information?

A dangerous loophole in the law allows candidates and their supporters to collect postal votes personally from electors and deliver them to the town hall. Labour minister Patricia Hewitt faced a police investigation over such activity in Leicester, where huge Asian households handed over large numbers of ballots. Unfortunately this is not illegal – electoral guidelines merely 'recommend' that candidates do not handle ballot papers. However, there is clearly the possibility that confused elderly people or foreigners who don't speak English could be tricked or bullied into handing over votes to Lib-Lab-Con thugs.

Postal voting is an inherently insecure method, because of the extra opportunity for fraud and tampering. Radio 4's Today programme demonstrated this last year when reporter Andrew Gilligan (Yes, he of the Saddam's WMD fame) tested the system for loopholes. By applying for postal votes in the names of deceased local electors, he demonstrated how easy it was to acquire large numbers of additional voting slips.

220 VOTES IN FOUR HOMES

Whilst this exercise was of course intended to demonstrate weaknesses rather than to pervert an election, there is no doubt that serious frauds are taking place right now in postal vote polls. The BNP newspaper Voice of Freedom (May 2003) indicates the problem is getting worse in 'rotten' boroughs such as Oldham, where this year 220 voters were registered in just four houses! The local paper there reported that over sixty people who turned up at the polling station were told they had 'already voted by post'.

With this level of fraud, why is the Establishment so keen on postal voting?

Partly, it is a desperate attempt to retain some semblance of legitimacy in what is now a bankrupt system. The pitifully low turnouts reflect voters' disillusionment with the Soviet-style system of candidates who essentially represent the same thing (Lib-Lab-Con). Postal voting undoubtedly raises turnouts, as even the apathetic are more likely to vote if they can avoid the physical effort of getting to a polling station.

The Establishment also believes – wrongly – that a higher turnout hurts the BNP. An article in The Guardian on May 4th ('Postal voting threat to BNP') quoted local government minister Nick Raynsford: "If you increase turnout there is a better chance they won't get through." In fact, most BNP councillors have been elected on record high turnouts, as their very presence as a genuine alternative stimulates controversy and interest in the electoral process.

Finally, the possibility for fraud is itself a bonus for the increasingly desperate Lib-Lab-Con Establishment, which has increasingly shown its willingness to use Zimbabwe-style methods against the BNP. Violence, intimidation in the workplace, verbal threats, outrageous lies in the controlled media, pro-Government thugs picketing polling stations – these are just a few of the dirty tricks employed against us. It should come as no surprise, therefore, when postal vote fraud is added to the list.

When BNP victories may sometimes hang on just a handful of votes, it is clear we must be vigilant at all times. It has been said, "the price of Democracy is eternal vigilance." In this context, the new-found willingness of the Party to mount legal challenges against electoral fraud has come not a moment too soon.

The European Election Campaign Kicks Off in Yorkshire

Yorkshire's Euro 2004 campaign started in earnest at a planning meeting involving the Regional Organisers and local officials in the three Ridings of Yorkshire on the 18th of May. The day started with a brief overview of how the campaign would work and how it would be funded. This was chaired by Tony Lecomber, Head of the Group Development Department and John Brayshaw the party's National Treasurer.

This was then followed up by a detailed meeting on 6th July, chaired by Chris Beverley the Regional Organiser for the West Ridings. Here detailed plans of the financing of the campaign were agreed and the type of leaflet to be used was chosen. Units were asked to raise a minimum of £1,000 each and contacts were asked to pass on donors to their nearest registered Group or Branch. Everyone was buoyed up by the news that one Branch alone had raised £1,200 since the first meeting in May.

The size/design for the election leaflets which would be delivered free by the Post Office was decided. The option chosen would cost the region £7,200, which be the present target. If by the beginning of September 2003 this sum has been reached, then consideration will be given to moving up to an even better leaflet. The next level up would cost an additional £4000. This would have to be raised before February 2004, which is when all Euro funds would be required to enable us to approach the printers with orders for millions of leaflets. Taking into account that local council elections funds would also be raised during this time it was agreed that it is important for the campaign not to overstretch itself on given the time limit.

While there is scope for the distribution of an anti-Euro warm-up leaflet, especially in more middle class areas, it was felt that the most important thing members can do in the months before the actual campaign is to assist their Fund Holders in raising funds.

The only additional work for now would be for a management team chosen principally by the candidate that won first place from the selection committee in Mid July. The No. 1 candidate would tour Yorkshire to involve as many members of the public as possible. Contact details for the Campaign Management Team i.e. e-mail addresses, phone lines and postal address would be in place very soon, as well as the appointments of an overall manager, a press officer and secretary.

Clearly, the officials and key activists of Yorkshire BNP have got their act together and are doing what needs to be done to make the maximum possible impact next June. Any other regions which haven't already held similar planning meetings and sorted out their fund-raising targets would be falling behind - there's no reason to. Let us work together now to make June 10th 2004 another major milestone in the advance of the British National Party.

Top regional candidates selected

The European election candidates' selection meeting was held in July as previously announced. The selection panel was made up of the Advisory Council, plus regional representatives chosen by all the local organisers and fund-holders on a regional basis. The selection was made following a presentation by each candidate, and after they had all answered identical questions put to them by the same members of the panel.

Candidates were chosen in this way for the first and second places on each regional list. Remaining places will be filled nearer the time, giving us the chance to ensure a good spread of candidates in terms of geography and other factors. In many cases the selection panel had a very difficult choice between really high quality candidates. Details of successful candidates – and what they plan to do to maximize our chances of success in the regions they will represent – will be published next issue.

Sustainable Energy Solutions for the Future

PART 1: PROBLEMS WITH THE CURRENT SITUATION

In this three part series Anthony Holroyd shows why we should be looking at alternatives to oil based energy sources. He defines some of the options that are now available and gives their advantages and disadvantages, particularly from a Nationalist viewpoint

The past eighteen months have seen growing international concern over the future of world oil production. Nothing else can explain the US invasion, with British support, of Iraq. Twelve years of economic sanctions had left the Iraqi economy in ruins and its armed forces and offensive capabilities were far weaker than they were in the early 1990's. As I write there is still no sign of any post-war recovery: in fact the reverse. As the world economy continues to grow, demand for storable liquid energy is growing in proportion. Many of the world's smaller oil reserves are already approaching peak capacity. North Sea oil and gas are now virtually exhausted. In 1985, the UK North Sea wells pumped as much as 2.5 million barrels per day. The average rate of production for 2000 had shrunk to just 750,000 barrels per day. The US and South American wells are also now in decline.

The only oil-producing region expected to significantly increase supply within the next ten years, is the Middle East. Recent BP estimates suggest that, even with a massive increase in supply from the Middle East, the total world oil supply is likely to peak by 2010. Once that 2010 peak is reached, total supply will decline. The consequences are likely to be devastating. The oil crises of the early 1970's resulted in a global recession. Unemployment in the US, reached double figures. And yet, this may simply have been a preview of things to come. Many analysts predict that within 15 years, the world may be facing a depression on the same scale as that which occurred in the 1930's. The only significant difference will be, that the new depression will be a permanent one. The recent war against Iraq is likely to be the first of a long series of oil wars. The 21st century it seems will be poorer and less secure than the 20th. And all of this may be just fifteen years away.

AGE OF TRANSFORMATION

Some fundamental structural changes to the world economy are both imminent and inevitable. Whilst these changes may appear frightening in their scale, they also hold the promise of unprecedented opportunity. The contemporary management expert Peter Drucker recently stated:

"Every few hundred years in Western society, there occurs a sharp transformation. Within a few short decades, society – its world view, its basic values, its social and political structures, its arts, its key institutions – rearranges itself, and people born then cannot imagine a world in which their grandparents lived and into which their own parents were born. We are currently living through such a transformation."

The energy crises is one of the most dangerous and difficult problems that human civilisation has ever had to face. Cheap oil is the basis of all modern industrial economies. We use oil as a fuel for transport, both local road transportation and global aviation and marine transportation. How can we maintain international trade without affordable oil? The concept of 'Free-trade' assumes the existence of a world without economic boundaries. In order for free trade to function effectively, global transportation costs must be extremely low. For example, the UK now imports a large variety of foodstuffs from around the world. In many nations, direct labour costs are lower and growing conditions more favourable. But from an energy point of view, free trade is very costly and environmentally damaging. For example: for every calorie of carrot flown into the UK from South Africa, approximately 66 calories of fuel oil are burned. Free trade is very oil intensive and very wasteful of energy. In 1998 the UK imported 61,400 tonnes of poultry from the Netherlands. In the same year it exported 33,100 tonnes of poultry back to the Netherlands. This trade arrangement is clearly wasteful of energy. It may allow greater economic efficiency, but it makes economic sense, only if (1) the price of fuel oil remains low and (2) if environmental issues such as global warming are considered irrelevant.

By the year 2015, oil prices are likely to be so high that they preclude effective free trade in many perishable products. But higher oil prices, are likely to have other consequences. Petrol and diesel fuel for automobile use are likely to become more expensive. This could in turn, increase the cost of transporting manufactured components and products, therefore depressing the economy. Heating will become more expensive. The price of air travel and foreign holidays will increase dramatically, given that air travel is very fuel intensive. If the UK economy remains dependent upon oil, wide scale unemployment and poverty are likely to result within fifteen years.

We cannot switch to other fossil fuel based energy sources. The problems posed by global warming cannot be ignored without serious environmental consequences. Global temperatures have already started to rise. Natural disasters such as hurricanes and typhoons are becoming increasingly more frequent and more intense. In addition to this, rising temperature opens the possibility of rising sea levels. Britain has the opportunity to set an example that the rest of the world can follow.

DEVELOPING A SUSTAINABLE OIL-FREE ECONOMY

The problems resulting from rising oil prices and global warming are likely to reduce the possibilities for global free trade within the next 15-20 years. Britain has become heavily dependent upon imported energy. North Sea oil and gas reserves are already virtually exhausted and in decline. Importing these two commodities is not an acceptable option. All indications show that the global price of oil and gas is likely to steadily increase within the next 15 years. Importing Britain's energy would also make the UK economy vulnerable to external shocks, such as wars, trade restrictions and other non-controllable foreign events. A Nationalist solution that is most likely to serve our long-term needs rests on two principle cornerstones:

1) The industrialisation of clean technologies on a large scale, such as national level energy efficiency projects, large-scale renewable energy projects, development of fusion power, satellite power, advanced nuclear power, direct electric transport and large scale national recycling schemes. The later can be used in support of synthetic gas manufacturing, which could in time, reduce Britain's dependence on increasingly scarce North Sea gas reserves.

2) The implementation of small community solutions, based around what we now call Community Distributism. These might include small community power projects, such as small-scale hydropower projects. Biogas initiatives are of particular interest, given that they can be linked to an organic fertiliser programme in rural and semi-urban communities and a widespread recycling programme on a nation-wide scale.

In order to produce the energy that we so desperately need, we are forced to look towards power sources that do not involve the combustion of oil-based fuels. Part of the difficulty is, that fossil fuels are used in transportation and heating, as well as direct electricity generation. Approximately one-third of the energy used within the UK is used in the transportation of people and goods. If we wish to replace fossil fuels entirely (and we must) we must look towards alternative transportation options and heating options, which do not involve the use of fossil fuels. It has been suggested that if we could find an electricity source that is cheap enough, it would be possible to supply all or most of our energy needs using direct electric power. We could also attempt to manufacture synthetic fuels from biomass materials.

SWITCHING FROM AN OIL BASED, TO AN ELECTRICITY BASED ECONOMY

Electric power is in itself completely clean. An electric motor, drawing power from a mains supply, does not produce carbon dioxide and does not necessarily depend upon imported energy. It is also very energy efficient. A car engine burning a synthetic fuel might only be 15-20% efficient at converting the stored chemical energy into useful kinetic energy. Electric motors generally have efficiencies of around 80%. Direct mains electricity, is by far the best alternative fuel available to us. It is totally pollution free at its point of use. It can also be produced in an enormous variety of ways. The electricity that powers an electric train could come from a nuclear reactor, a wind farm, a wave-power generator, or even a fusion reactor. If oil were to become too expensive for electricity production, we would not need to change our entire electric transport infrastructure. We would simply build an alternative power plant. A car engine on the other hand, is far more limited in its available energy source.

IN-BUILT ELECTRIC TRANSPORTATION

In the November and December 2002 editions of Identity, we explored the idea of building highly land-efficient, traditional-style towns and cities rather like the late medieval cities of Canterbury, Venice, Bruges and Amsterdam. Using modern technology, it is entirely possible to design and build a rail-based transportation system for these cities, which would run entirely on electricity. A city with an inbuilt electric transportation system can be made entirely free from cars, trucks and other road vehicles. The streets could be entirely pedestrianised and therefore quiet, peaceful and the air 100% pollution-free. Canal boats or under-ground electric train and conveyor systems, would transport material goods throughout the city. A city built to this model would be far more human-friendly than our present-day towns and cities. It would also be far more compact than contemporary cities and would therefore protect the surrounding countryside from urban sprawl. An added advantage associated with this type of city, is its total independence from fossil fuels. All that it requires is a reliable source of electricity. How do we produce that electricity in an economic and environmentally benign way?

THE CELTS

PART 4: CULTURES AND CUSTOMS FROM IRELAND TO INDIA

By NICK GRIFFIN, MA (Hons) Cantab

Although they were ferocious enemies, the Celts were certainly not unwashed or uncultured barbarians. The fourth-century AD Graeco-Roman historian Ammianus Marcellinus noted that "the Gauls are all exceedingly careful of cleanliness and neatness, nor in all the country . . . could any man or woman, however poor, be seen either dirty or ragged." Pliny tells us that the Celts invented soap and were taking regular baths long before the Romans adopted the habit. The women used perfumes and cosmetics, checking their appearance in delicately decorated bronze mirrors. The men were generally clean-shaven, except for their characteristic long, drooping moustaches. The Celts had a great reverence for natural beauty, including that of the human body. Obese men, unsightly and unfit for war, could be fined.

As with all the peoples of northern Europe before the coming of Christianity, their women enjoyed a great deal of freedom, and sex was not regarded as sinful. When the wife of fourth-century historian Sulpicius Severus reproached the wife of an aristocratic Celt for the wantonness of Celtic women, the Celtic woman replied cuttingly: "We fulfill the demands of Nature in a much better way than do you Roman women: for we consort openly with the best men, whereas you let yourselves be debauched in secret by the vilest." In those late days of decadent Rome, commerce and wealth were overwhelmingly in the hands of immigrant Levantine merchants, so the proud Celt chose her words well.

Both sexes were well dressed. The toga-wearing Mediterraneans were especially impressed by the trousers favoured by the men, a practical fashion the Romans adopted for their cavalry--the best of whom were in any case recruited from Celtic tribes. Knee-length linen tunics were worn by both sexes, as were long and often gaudy woollen cloaks. Strabo comments on their personal ostentation:

To the frankness and high-spiritedness of their temperament must be added the traits of childish boastfulness and love of decoration. They wear ornaments of gold, torques on their necks, and bracelets on their arms and wrists, while people of high rank wear dyed garments besprinkled with gold. It is this vanity which makes them unbearable in victory and so completely downcast in defeat.

Linen and woollen garments from the Celtic lands were popular with well-to-do Romans, as was Celtic leatherwork, including fashionable Gaulish boots. Archaeologists have recovered fragments of Celtic textiles which, as with their metalwork, show consistent levels of skill which can only have been maintained by a well-ordered system of craft apprenticeship.

Such specialization is only possible in a society with regular surpluses of food; hence, it is no surprise to learn that the Celts were great farmers. Many of their agricultural innovations remained the basis of the rural economies of the European peoples until the modern era. These included the system of leaving fields fallow every third year; the heavy, two-wheeled iron plough; the harrow; the hay-scythe; the breeding of strains of cattle for various roles, including draught purposes; the selective development of new types of grain; and the cultivation and use of a large number of herbs.

EARLY COMBINE HARVESTER

Recently, at Butser Hill in the South of England experimental archaeologists have recreated an Iron Age farm. Using only the techniques and tools possessed by the Celts, they have found that their small fields of wheat yield similar quantities to those expected by English farmers in the 19th century. Although this is only half the modern yield, analysis of the grain shows that it has twice the protein content of today's heavily chemical-dependent crops.

For many years, historians of the period were puzzled by evidence of a strange cart with a long row of wooden teeth along its front edge and drive shafts to allow a horse or ox to push it. The Butser Hill researchers built a replica and thereby proved it to be a "combine harvester," giving the big estates of late Celtic times the ability to harvest far larger areas than would have been possible by hand. Once collected, the grain was stored in pits dug deep into the ground, lined with basketry and sealed with a lid of wet clay. This method has also been tested at the experimental farm and shown to work well even in unusually wet years.

These facts suggest that one of the reasons for the Roman conquest of Britain was to secure a large and reliable supply of grain to feed the legions and the growing population of parasites in Rome. But before the inexorable rise of Rome ripped the heart from the Celtic world, the Celts built upon this sound agricultural base a sophisticated and clearly European rural civilization.

The Celts of Ireland, whose culture was never disrupted by Roman invasion and which continued to prosper for centuries, did not grow such quantities of grain. The wet and mild climate of Ireland, while unsuitable for wheat, is ideal for rearing cattle, so the country's economy was always based on them. Fines were based on the value of a cow, cattle-raiding was endemic--a cross between an aristocratic sport and tribal warfare--and seasonal cattle fairs combined with religious festivals to provide the focus for a totally rural way of life.

This emphasis on cattle may well have preserved the lifestyle of the earlier continental Celts. The La Tene culture developed following a marked climatic deterioration and an accompanying increase in the importance of cattle. The great Irish epic, The Cattle Raid of Cooley, although not put into writing until the twelfth century, uses language from four hundred years before and has some verses which appear to date back to the sixth century; and even the latter are based on a tradition which was already hundreds of years old when they were composed. Regarded as the oldest vernacular epic in Western literature, the story describes a society of boastful warrior-aristocrats: chariot fighting and feasting, head-hunting and cattle-raiding. It is an authentic picture of the Iron Age.

These stories, with their emphasis on personal honour, physical courage, and loyalty unto death, bear marked resemblances to ancient Greek epics, such as Homer's Iliad. Both the Romans and the Greeks approved strongly of the typical Celtic maxim quoted by Diogenes: "To worship the gods, to do nothing base, and to practice manhood." Closer to home, the original motifs discernable in the heavily Christianized Welsh Mabinogion reveal the fundamental unity of the Celts' great tradition of oral literature, its close kinship with the original culture of all the early Indo-Europeans, and its similarity to the later sagas of the Germanic branch of the family.

In Ireland these tales were preserved and declaimed by the filid, an ancient institution of highly trained storytellers and law-bearers, who enjoyed high rank and, through their ability to praise or satirize a ruler, substantial power. Their role and status were very similar to those of the vates described by Strabo as important among the Gauls, who were as a people so renowned for their eloquence that wealthy Romans sent their sons to be trained in rhetoric by Gaulish tutors.

THE DRUIDS

Even more demanding was the 20-year training undergone by the Druids, the mysterious priests and seers who, according to Caesar, "are concerned with the worship of the gods, look after public and private sacrifice, and expound religious matters; a large number of young men flock to them for training and hold them in the highest honour." The Druids were also renowned for their knowledge of the stars and the motions of the planets. A bronze moveable calendar found at Coligny in France was used to predict eclipses as well as to note the passage of the months. Rather than days, they thought in terms of nights—our word "fortnight" being a distant echo of this. As with the Germanic peoples from whom we get the word for our main divisions of the year, the Celts reckoned by the phases of the moon, splitting their year into 28-day cycles. These in turn were grouped into four seasons, the start of each of which was marked by a religious festival intimately linked with the natural concerns of a farming people.

The Celtic New Year began on Samhain, at the beginning of November. This marked the gathering in of the cattle and the slaughter of livestock which could not be over-wintered. Imbolc fell on the first day of February and seems to have been connected with the lactation of ewes. Beltaine—the feast of the Good Fire—was the forerunner of the later May Day celebrations and marked the day when the spring sun allowed the herds to be let out onto the fresh pastures, having been driven through twin fires around which the young men and women danced sunwise. Lughnasadh, on the first day of August, was even more strongly a sun festival, being dedicated to the solar god Lugh.

A number of gods seem to have been widely revered. Lugh's name occurs in placenames from Lyon (ancient Lugdunum) to Carlisle (ancient Caer Luel); Cernunnos—"the Horned One"—is named on an altar in Paris and is widely represented elsewhere, including on the Gundestrop cauldron. The cult of the horse goddess Epona seems to have been popular in Britain and may even account for the long-standing British taboo against eating horsemeat. There does not, however, appear to have been a single, well organized pantheon of gods on the Greek or Roman model. In addition to local communal gods, each family worshipped its own ancestors, gathering in prayer around the hearth which, as with the Romans, was the spiritual center of the home.

Like all the true Indo-Europeans, the Celts did not consider the worship of any particular god to preclude veneration for another. This acceptance that other folk could pray to different deities without being regarded as sinful non-believers is reflected in the ancient and widely accepted Irish oath: "I swear by the gods my people swear by."

As well as leading the sacrifices and rituals at the great festivals, the Druids taught the doctrine of the immortality of the soul. This belief was no doubt a major reason for the Celts' total lack of fear of death. So strong was their faith in the afterlife that they would make loans in this life with agreement to repay them in the next.

Caesar also noted that the Druids were recruited only from the aristocracy and that they delivered legal judgments in everything from murder cases to boundary disputes. In this judicial role, there was an overlap between the functions and rights of the Druids and of the brithem, experts on the traditional brehon law of Ireland recruited from the ranks of the filid poetic order.

This latter fact, together with Caesar's accounts of Druidic human sacrifice and statement that the cult originated in Britain, suggests that the Druidic order was not entirely of Celtic origin, but had its roots among the older Atlanto-Mediterranean population. Having said that, the Italic tribes and early Romans had a similar institution, as did the early Indo-European conquerors of Iran (derived from Aryan) and the northern part of the Indian subcontinent. It is also necessary to remember that Caesar's account was sensationalist propaganda aimed at boosting his own prestige by, among other things, painting an ugly picture of his enemies. The real reason for his determination to exterminate the Druids was probably their key role in stirring up rebellions, both in Britain and in Gaul.

The fundamental religion of all these peoples was based on the sun worship which was universal among their common ancestors, and the Celts were no exception. The sunwheel and three- and four-armed swastikas are common Celtic solar symbols. The life-giving force of the sun is, of course, more important to a people living in a land of harsh winters than to those who dwell in warmer climes, hence it is quite possible that this religion, like the fair complexions of its devotees, arose thousands of years earlier among their ancient ancestors, who had for generations survived the rigors of life on the edge of the European ice sheets.

By the time the Indo-Europeans began to spread out from their original homeland, their religion, like their language, was already fully developed, with the result that, in the words of distinguished British archaeologist Professor T.G.E. Powell: "There are many vestiges in myth, cult, and sacred terminology, springing from a common Indo-European tradition which the Celts shared in particular with the Aryan ancestors of the Hindus and with the Italic forerunners of the Romans."

The same was true of many Celtic laws and institutions of government. The Irish brehon laws dealt with all aspects of social organization, including marriage, distraint, sick-maintenance, and the relationships between the different strata of society. These were ancient when finally put into writing by Christian monks at the end of the sixth century. Preserved orally until then in verse form, the language was already archaic and many points obscure. According to the Irish expert, Professor Binchy, "Irish law preserves in a semi-fossilized condition many primitive Indo-European institutions of which only faint traces survive in other legal systems derived from the same source."

THE INDIA CONNECTION

Many historians have noted the marked similarities between the Celtic laws and social structure found in Ireland and the fossilized Indo-European (Aryan) system preserved in the Vedic laws of India. The duties and privileges of the now hereditary Brahmin caste certainly reflect those of the Druids, as well as those of the Magi of Iran. According to the French expert on the Celts, the late Professor Henri Hubert, "the priesthoods are not merely very similar, but exactly the same," and this "proves that Druidism was an Indo-European institution," albeit a pre-Celtic one inherited from the Aryan farmers who had settled in Britain and Gaul long before the great period of Celtic expansion. Many aspects of the institution of kingship are clearly related; even the vocabulary involved is fundamentally the same. Binchy comments that in the brehon laws "we also find the unreal schematism and passion for classification which meet us in the Hindu law books."

Nora Chadwick, late professor of Anglo-Saxon at Cambridge and internationally renowned authority on the origins and customs of the Celtic peoples, in her book The Celts (1970) notes that the customs connected with the symbolic "marriage" between the king and the land have affinities with traditions traceable to ancient India, and that such similarities show the "close relationships" between the two far-flung groups of Indo-Europeans. Quite apart from the links with northern India, she also points out that "the society of Homeric Greece offers parallels, and in Italy the Italic-speaking peoples possessed perhaps the closest links with the Celts until the supervention of Etruscan and, then, urban Roman institutions."

There is also Professor Colin Renfrew's convincing theory about the link between the initial expansion of the Indo-Europeans and the spread of subsistence agriculture if we think in terms of the first wave of farmers spreading by slow colonization over many generations, as he maintains, and then the subsequent development in one part of their range of some improvement in military technology which gave its possessors the opportunity to spread, in a far shorter time, as an aristocracy ruling over their more and more distant relations. Thus, the Battle Axe people may have been the first such example of a later early European elite, rather than the initial carriers of the Indo-European language and racial type.

British independence — what's UKIP's real agenda?

By CLIVE WAKLEY

For some two years now we have been hearing rumours concerning a faction within UKIP who see Britain's post EU future, not as an independent nation but as a "partner" of the US, or to put it bluntly — as a de-facto US state.

To be precise they view Britain's withdrawal from Europe not as an end in itself, but as a stepping stone towards the total immersion of Britain in a US dominated "English speaking" North Atlantic economic, military and political bloc.

Since last autumn such rumours have increased both in regularity and in reliability — reflecting the increasing influence of the pro-US faction under the tutelage of certain elements within UKIP's current leadership.

It therefore comes as no surprise to receive additional evidence, from the columns of the Daily Telegraph no less, of the increasing interaction between some in UKIP and various vested interests closely connected with the US political establishment.

We reproduce the said item, which appeared under the "London Spy" column of The Telegraph's May 29th edition, here in full:

"Now that the war in Iraq has ended, America's major political players are taking an ever closer interest in international politics. Take Dick Morris, who as chief strategist, masterminded Bill Clinton's election victory in 1996. Spy can reveal that the former spin doctor, — once dubbed "the second most powerful man in the White House" — will spend Saturday and Sunday in negotiations with the UK Independence Party, with a view to running its campaign for next year's European elections.

Morris believes that Britain's continued membership of the EU poses a fundamental threat to the English-speaking world" says a senior UKIP source. "He has expressed a serious interest in UKIP's philosophy, and we now want to sign him up for the election campaign. The only question is whether we'll be able to afford him."

If nothing else Morris should at least liven up UKIP cocktail parties. A colourful character — he was once caught entertaining a prostitute in a Washington hotel..

On Europe, he recently wrote: "The political lesson of the war in Iraq is that the people of America and Britain have far more in common than do the British people with the French or the Germans."

Sources within UKIP claim that Morris is being offered a hefty £250,000 from party coffers for "consultancy services" between now and the next General Election!

Morris's involvement with UKIP should be a matter of grave concern for all patriots campaigning for genuine British independence — such patriots should ask:

Inset: Dick Morris

— Why it is that someone of Morris's political status, a man once dubbed "the second most powerful man in the White House", should be interested in the fortunes of a minor and obscure British political party? Indeed, outside of a few southern English shires, few have ever even heard of UKIP!

— Why it is that a party supposedly dedicated to "British independence" should be so keen to employ the services of someone who is, to put it mildly, US orientated? Someone who has only recently gone down on record as stating that "the people of America and Britain have far more in common than do the British people with the French or the Germans." and, even more telling — "Britain's future lies over the Atlantic — not the Channel".

So what, exactly, is UKIP's definition of "independence" and what is their real agenda?

For those interested in Dick Morris's less than wholesome, background the following piece from Private Eye magazine (May 30th) provides an interesting glimpse.

"As the man who had cynically guided the paper's bete noire Bill Clinton to electoral success before resigning after admitting to sleeping with a prostitute, Morris was surely viewed as the devil incarnate by Charles Moore D. Telegraph editor) and his fellow high-minded Tories.

In 1997 Alexander Chancellor used his Footnote column to call Morris "a sleazebag".

A year later, when Morris reared his head during the Monicagate scandal, the newspaper gleefully raked over the sordid detail of his demise. "According to Sherry Rowlands, the prostitute Mr. Morris hired, he only rarely had conventional sex with her. He preferred her to suck his toes, tickle his naked body and rub her feet over his face, his chest and genitals, pressing as hard as she could. He would then 'go on all fours like a dog under my feet'."

THE MULTIRACIALISTS TURN ON EAST ANGLIA

Report by the Editor

Norfolk, Suffolk, North Essex and East Cambridgeshire, the heartland of East Anglia, have become a favourite bolt-hole for white-flighters from London and the Midlands. Norwich, which apart from Cambridge, is the only city in East Anglia proper and until recently was distinguished by being the whitest city still left in England and Wales.

It appears that this has not escaped the attention of the political establishment's multi-culturalists for everything is on the change.

On June 4th the Norwich Evening News reported that the first group of 400 asylum seekers had arrived in the city. Private sector housing has been provided for the "refugees", as economic migrants are now euphemistically called, and that "Clearsprings, the firm which was awarded the contract to house the asylum seekers, would not reveal where the first intake had been given homes."

This follows the decision in April 2000 when Norwich was designated as a cluster area for asylum seekers to ease the burden on London and the south east.

Dan Pritchard, a spokesman for Norfolk County Council, said it had been preparing for the arrival for a long time. "In terms of education, we have been planning for some time with Clearsprings for this, and have made all the necessary preparations for families with school age children who may arrive. Anyone who may need social service will be assessed and, if appropriate, offered care and support."

Well, if nearly every other part of Britain is anything to go by, these economic migrants will be there demanding their "social services", which we have paid for, from day one!

Refugees from Africa

On June 7th the Eastern Daily Press reported that Norfolk and Suffolk may be chosen to accept refugees from Africa, as part of a United Nations resettlement programme. Six counties in the East of England Consortium for Asylum Seeker Support (where do these do-gooders dream up these names?) had been asked to help house some of the 500 refugees under the above UN programme.

In Ipswich there has historically been a non-white sector of the population, partly due to its origins as a port. Ironically, it is often from them that most vocal opposition is expressed to the increasing number of "asylum seekers". One must have sympathy for the descendants of these earlier immigrants and pragmatism suggests that we can live with the exceptions without wishing to make them the norm.

Chinese influx in King's Lynn

Also in early June the Eastern Daily Press was reporting a series of events involving illegal Chinese immigrants in Kings Lynn, the Norfolk port on The Wash. It stated that the number of Chinese in the town "had risen by about 1500 in the past year". Prior to that locals estimate that there were about 500, plus another 500 Africans, Albanians and assorted "asylum seekers".

Metropolitan Police had visited the town investigating gangland-style killing in London's Soho. They believed the shooting had been connected to the 'Snakehead' gangs behind a multi-million-pound trade smuggling people from China to Europe, including thousands of illegals to Britain. The gangs are heavily armed and violent, often torturing their victims and keeping them in Britain until families in China pay ransoms. Many of the Chinese work in food processing or farming in Norfolk, Cambridgeshire and Lincolnshire, often for as little as £2 per hour.

Immigration officers estimate that more than 2000 Chinese could be working illegally at farms and packhouses across the area. As a result, it was announced on July 12th that an office has been set up to house 12 full-time immigration officials in Swaffam, which triples the number of immigration officers in Norfolk.

Houses in Kings Lynn have been found to hold up to 30 Chinese immigrants, causing many unheeded complaints and "attacks by vandals" in the past.

Things came to a head on June 8th when a fire destroyed one such house, with 18 Chinese inhabitants escaping unhurt. Arson was at first suspected, with the usual talk of "white racists" being responsible, but it was later found that it was due to faulty electrical wiring.

Local Tory MP, Henry Bellingham, has expressed his concern at the number of Chinese coming into the town and said that it was urgent that they "have the relevant work permits and are being properly paid." – as if that is going to solve the problem.

To be fair to him, more recently he made a telling point when he said: "The supermarkets also have a role to play in all this: they talk about ethical produce, they should be looking at the exploitation of illegal immigrants in this country working in the food industry."

The leader of the Borough Council, John Dobson, got nearer to the root of the problem when he said: "I think it's a very serious problem ... stems from the fact that we as a country, cannot return them to China".

A BNP government would do something about it. First, by demanding a complete revision of the 1951 United Nations Refugee Convention, which was not designed to deal with third world economic migrants. Second, by withdrawing from Article 3 of the European Convention on Human Rights.

This is how children looked in most British schools prior to 1950 – and still do today in this Bury St. Edmunds school. This obviously offends the liberal-left multiculturalists, who want East Anglian schools to look just like any modern inner city school.

A NATIONALIST Notebook

JOHN BEAN looks at issues in the News and Behind the News

YOU LOT ARE STUPID

The problems caused by the torrent of phoney 'asylum' seekers flooding into Britain are no longer being ignored by the national press, even if the British Brainwashing Corporation still tries to portray them as being beneficial to our economy. Most newspapers have covered, for example, the swamping of our hospitals by the demands of hundreds of thousands of immigrants and particularly those from Africa suffering from Aids. Each Aids sufferer costs our NHS £40,000 a year, which is likely to total £10 Billion in the next 18 months! The press may no longer be hiding these facts, but where is their acknowledgement of the fact that the BNP is the only political party calling for a halt to all further immigration? We don't expect their support, but no doubt the people will soon see through their continual barrage of distortion, lies and character assassination of BNP activists.

For its much publicised "Asylum Night" (in which BBC TV managed to represent all shades of opinion – except the BNP!) BBC Panorama showed an investigation it had carried out into how easy it is for asylum seekers to abuse the system. Also published in the Sunday Telegraph's Review section of July 20th, it was mainly the work of Claudia Murg, herself of Romanian origin, who went undercover.

Needing to obtain a National Insurance card for better wages, she was told by established 'asylum' seekers to go to Victoria Station in London. "Practically the first man I bumped into was a Romanian who put me in touch with someone called Claudio." He said he could get her false papers.

"Claudio was an 'asylum shopper':

he had been to Holland, where he had been kicked out, and Germany, which had given him the same treatment, before arriving in Britain. The British had turned down his application for asylum – but then decided to give him 'exceptional leave to remain'.

"It cost me £150 to buy a fake National Insurance card (from Claudio). A fake European identity card ... cost me a further £85. With this I was told I could open a bank account. He said I should then rip off the bank for as much money as possible. 'Show the bank no mercy, my girl. Make them pay. The account won't be in your real name. Take the money and never give it back to them.'"

Claudia Murg also described the operations of a major Romanian asylum fraudster called Gabi. She met him in Birmingham after being told that there it was possible to rent flats cheaply from asylum seekers who had been given free accommodation. "That proved to be true", she wrote.

BMW driver Gabi told her he loves Britain. "There is no country like this country", he said.

"While Sandwell Metropolitan Borough Council pays for his private flat in Birmingham, he and his wife and children live in London. Meanwhile he sub-lets the flat in Birmingham, making £350 a month from it. He still needs a key to that flat, he explains, because he is using it as his permanent address: it is where his weekly giro cheque of £176 is sent. No one, he said, from either the Home Office, Social Securities or the Immigration Service, has ever checked up on him."

As a result of her undercover investigation Claudia Murg comes to the conclusion that many asylum seekers are "simply abusing the system." She adds: "Their attitude is something akin to: 'Well, you lot are stupid. If you offer it, we'll take it.'"

The best offer they would get from a BNP government would be a one way ticket to wherever they came from, or the last country they visited before arriving here.

WOT, NO NECROPHILIA?

Alex Olle, the director of a Spanish theatre company, says that the English are still "the most sexually repressed people in Europe". This was after his sexually-explicit stage show, XXX, outraged audiences in London and was drawn to the attention of the vice squad – they cleared it.

It was based upon the Marquis de Sade's 1795 novel Philosophy in the Bedroom in which a young woman is sexually violated by a group of libertines. The modern stage version charts the seduction and corruption of a young virgin by three porn stars. Principal sadist is Pedro Gutierrez (a black Spaniard). It featured full-frontal nudity and simulated sex acts including masturbation, bestiality, sodomy and lesbianism.

About all it lacked was necrophilia, but no doubt this will soon be upon our avant-garde theatre stages and all in the name of culture.

CONTROLLERS OF THE TELEGRAPH

Since a Mail on Sunday investigation cast serious doubt on whether maverick Labour MP George Galloway did in fact receive millions for supporting Saddam, all is now quiet on this issue. This is no doubt because Galloway fully intends on going ahead with his libel actions against the Daily Telegraph and the Christian Science Monitor.

If we are sometimes puzzled by the stand the Telegraph group takes on various political issues from time to time, the following paragraph from a fund appeal letter George Galloway is sending out makes interesting reading.

"The Telegraph group is controlled by Lord and Lady Black (Barbara Amiel), two of Sharon's Israel's most vociferous supporters. On Black's board of directors sit Richard Perle and Henry Kissinger, as did once Margaret Thatcher. I mention this so you'll know what we're up against and the bitter and expensive fight on which I have embarked."

WE DEMAND HUMANE SLAUGHTER OF ANIMALS

In the BNP you can be a vegetarian, a fish eater, or, like me, a meat and two veg person. As far back as I can remember our main proviso has always been that animals reared for meat should always be slaughtered in the most humane way possible. The overwhelming opinion of veterinary surgeons is that the Halal and Shekita religious methods of slaughter, whereby the animal is fully conscious while its throat is cut and then allowed to slowly bleed to death, inflicts unnecessary pain on the animal. For pointing this out, we have – of course – been accused of being anti-Moslem and anti-Semitic.

Now, TV celebrity Selina Scott is also being accused of being anti-Moslem and anti-Semitic for condemning this form of slaughter as a barbaric practice. She did so writing her regular column in Glasgow's Sunday Mail, June 15th.

"Britain is a tolerant country", she wrote, "but we should make it crystal clear to religious groups and immigrants we have a uniform standard on animal slaughter."

She added: "But just as we have to accept the customs of Middle Eastern countries, including the banning of alcohol, while we live among them, so they must accept our views on animal welfare when they make their home here."

Now what probably caused Bashire Maan, Scottish representative of the Muslim Council of Great Britain, to burst a blood vessel and call for Selina

Scott to be dismissed and prosecuted, was the following passage in her article:

"For those who don't like it there's an easy remedy. They could always make a valuable contribution to the government's reverse migration policy."

Well said Selina!

BLACK CRIME IN SOUTH LONDON

The following two murder cases were reported in the South London Press of July 10th.

Ernest Wilson fractured his skull when his head struck the pavement after he was hit by one of two mean who approached him at night in Cedars Road, Clapham. He returned to the Cedars Road hostel where he lived, but was found the following morning collapsed in his room, having died of the head injuries.

His sister Caroline said: "He was such a placid man. He would walk away from trouble. He was a big softy..."

Both suspects are described as 5ft 8in tall black males in their twenties.

The second murder report began: "A burglar smothered his elderly neighbour in her home and left her dead on the floor to be found by her son, a jury heard. Orville Murray, 34, killed 79-year-old grandmother Angela Demetriou six months after he arrived in England from Jamaica.

Mr Murray suffocated the frail woman as she fought for her life, leaving his DNA under her fingernails, it is alleged."

It is not suggested for one moment that all black people in Britain are criminals, let alone murderers. But the statistics do tend to show that they have a higher propensity for violent crime, but political correctness will deny this being said publicly.

BRITISH NATIONALS IN CUBA

Amongst the several hundred prisoners who fought for al-Qaeda in Afghanistan and who were taken to Guantanamo Bay in Cuba by the Americans are nine who the media refer to as 'Britons'. These young Moslem men are all of Arab or Pakistani descent and although some were born in the UK this surely does not make them "Britons? A more correct term would be "British Nationals". But that would be asking too much of the multiculturalists who control much of our media.

One of the two British Nationals immediately facing terrorism charges is Moazzam Begg. His father has appeared almost nightly on TV last month to tell us how innocent his son is. The fact that he was arrested in 1994 by MI5 for possessing a flak jacket and night vision goggles (charges were later dropped) is not mentioned. He was also on benefit fraud charges at one time. Not exactly a capital offence (!), but let us hear what the American prosecution has to say before we are asked again to feel sorry for him.

BRAINWASHING SCOTTISH STUDENTS

Bob Mills, one of our West Lothian readers, has sent us a copy of the close reading section of this year's Higher English exam in Scotland (equivalent to the English A level). The exam paper was based entirely on two of the most biased pro-multicultural articles one is ever likely to read; one from the Glasgow Herald and the other from the Guardian.

The first 'passage' (article) was from the Herald of June 2002 and was by liberal-left journalist and broadcaster Ruth Wishart explaining how good immigration can be for Scotland. The passage from the Guardian (also June 2002) was by Anne Karpf, where she explores past and present coverage of immigration issues and tells a 'heart-warming' story of a family from Kosovo who sought asylum in Britain. The examiners' instructions to the pupils emphasise that they should "understand what the writers are saying about refugees, asylum seekers, and immigration in general; analyse their choices of language, imagery and structures to recognise how they convey their points of view and contribute to the impact of the passages."

Bob Mills speaks for most Identity readers when he says: "I am saddened and dismayed that two such politically subjective, overly qualitative and lunatic-fringe articles of the alleged benefits to Scotland and the UK of mass immigration could appear in a Scottish Qualifications Authority paper aimed at impressionable teenagers."

ASYLUM

BBC bottle it at last minute

By SIMON DARBY

When the BBC recently filmed "Question Time" from studios in Burnley, the fact that the British National Party was not involved caused much embarrassment and consternation within the corporation. Such a blatant overlooking of a major local political entity was obviously playing fast and loose with the BBC's own charter on impartiality.

With this in mind the British National Party had decided to keep the fact that a representative had been invited onto a special Panorama "asylum" panel relatively low key.

The BNP's involvement would have seen us take part in the special day of programming on July 23 concerning the issue of asylum.

This of course was only logical as the perceived threat of the BNP was the primary reason why the whole asylum issue had been thrust into the Public arena.

However, two days before the event, a telephone call was received informing the party that our involvement in the programme had been suddenly cancelled.

Consequently what would have been an even livelier debate, broadly in tune with public opinion and reflecting recent electoral trends was transformed into something completely different. The British public had to endure what was, with a few exceptions, another emasculated and skewed offering from our state funded broadcaster on immigration related affairs.

The sequence of events regarding the BNP's unprecedented dropping from the "asylum" itinerary is as follows. The BBC journalist who liaised with the party is referred to as "NB" in the telephone transcripts.

THURSDAY 10TH JULY

NB "Can I speak to a British National Party councillor."

Cllr Simon Darby (BNP West Mids Organiser): "Yes, of course, who's calling please."

NB "I am from the BBC and we want to have a BNP councillor from the midlands as part of a special panel concerning a debate about asylum."

SD "Well, I'm a councillor myself and I might be able to help you out. Can you tell me a little more about the circumstances of the programme?"

NB "Sure, it's part of a whole series of programmes on Wednesday 23rd concerning asylum and we would need you in the studio at around about 10pm."

SD "Who else is on the panel and which studio would it be filmed from?"

NB "The programme is being broadcast live from Liverpool, but we can get you into a studio at Pebble Mill. Oliver Letwin will be one of the other panelists, can I give you a call next week to finalise things?"

SD "No problem, I look forward to it."

MONDAY 14TH JULY

NB "Hello, it's NB from the BBC here just ringing to see if we are still on for next week."

SD "Yes of course."

NB "We will send a car for you, what time should it arrive to get you in studio by 10pm?"

SD "Depending on the motorway, I think at that time of night you should be safe picking me up about 9pm."

NB "Fine, can you tell me a little more about what opinions you are going to put across?"

SD "Well, who else is going to be on the panel?"

NB "David Blunkett, Oliver Letwin, Peter Hitchens, MigrationWatch and The Refugee Council."

SD "The Home Secretary, seriously?"

NB "Yes, hopefully."

SD "Well obviously I'd like to get across the revised Tenancy Agreement document and detail exactly what asylum seekers are getting. Twenty-inch colour televisions complete with licenses, fridges, freezers, council tax paid, electricity and gas bills paid, all telephone bills paid, they even get their windows cleaned for them. I would also like to explain our exact obligations with regards the United Nations. Namely, the fact that the Dublin convention (1990) establishes a common criteria for EU member states to determinate state responsibility for asylum seekers based on the relevant "safe country". Therefore, we are only obliged to take in asylum seekers from Ireland, Iceland and Belgium for instance.

Also I would like to negate the spurious economic arguments about accepting asylum seekers. Asylum seekers artificially depress wages in industrial sectors where they seek employment. As such this creates non-viable employment prospects for the indigenous population and also severely affects the prospects of the more established immigrant populations. In any case if all these people are so hard-working and qualified, as the liberals say, what right have we got in looting the Third world of all its best people?"

NB "OK that's fine."

SD "Obviously I will be a bit better explaining things in the studio."

NB "Right, I'll call you next week to finalise things."

MONDAY 21ST JULY 3.15PM

NB "Hello, it's NB from the BBC here, just letting you know that we have decided to cancel the interview for tomorrow"

SD "Do you mean Wednesday?"

NB "Yes, sorry, I was referring to Wednesday"

SD "Why?."

NB "It's just that we have decided to give more time to audience participation. We are going to have more people phone in and ask questions."

SD "Have you decided to scrap the whole panel idea."

NB "Not exactly"

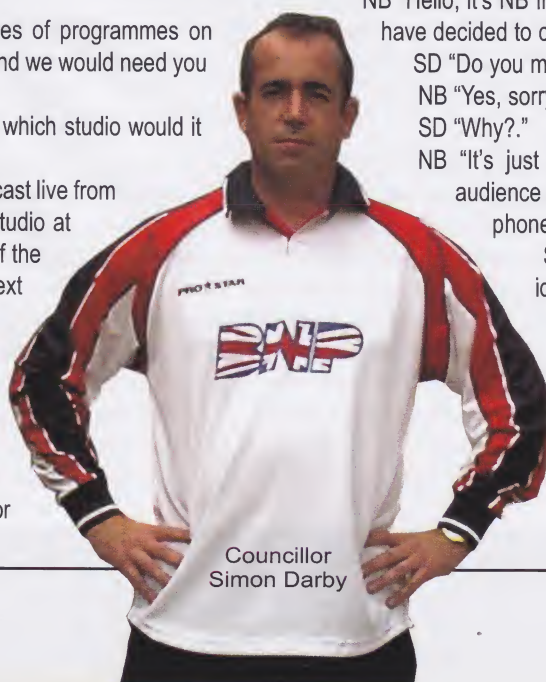

SD "Will Oliver Letwin still be on?"

NB "Yes"

SD "Will Peter Hitchens still be on?"

NB "Yes"

SD "Will Migration Watch, the Refugee Council and Blunkett still be on?"

Councillor
Simon Darby

NB "Yes, but we are still not sure about David Blunkett."
 SD "Hang on then, it's just the BNP you are dropping then."
 NB "Not exactly, there will still be people in the audience who say they will be voting BNP."

SD "So the closest thing you are prepared to allow to BNP representation is a proxy interpretation of what we are perceived to stand for via an invited audience?"

NB "It's not that, we just needed to gain more time for audience participation."

SD "You're struggling, why don't you just tell me that someone has told you that you are forbidden to have the BNP on the debate?"

NB "It's not like that."

SD "Well, you guys at the BBC, your going to have to learn the hard way."

What caused the change of mind? So just what was it that provoked this sudden change of mind within the heart of BBC political programming? Was it perhaps the undignified squabbling between the government and the BBC over the Iraq conflict that had literally driven a civil servant to death. Could it be that having the BNP pushing establishment politicians hard over asylum live on television in front of an audience of millions would have put even more strain on the already precarious working relationship between the government and the beeb?

One thing is for sure though, the BBC's own charter on impartiality states that; "No significant strand of thought should go unselected or under represented on the BBC."

A fact that British people are constantly reminded of when the BBC deals with the 9% of the population that make up the ethnic minorities.

Moreover, there is obviously increasing friction between middle-management at the BBC, who are perfectly at ease with allowing the views of British nationalists to be broadcast, and the politically-motivated elite who occupy the higher echelons of the corporation. At a time when the BBC is seeking to repair it's somewhat tarnished image this heavy handed and clumsy censorship will do them no favours whatsoever amongst an increasing sceptical and angry British electorate.

It is ironic that in Sandwell, where the BBC focused much of its asylum programming, two British National Party councillors were at the time of the programme putting forward a motion that was read at a full council meeting. The motion read:

"The BNP group hereby propose the following motion for consideration at the Council meeting on 22nd of July, 2003, and that the motion be considered without reference to a Committee, or Cabinet Member.

"That the dispersal, and current housing within Sandwell, of all Economic Migrants, termed largely as "Asylum Seekers", should be halted at the earliest opportunity, and the relevant government minister, and/or department, as necessary, be informed of this resolution."

Although it is highly unlikely that this motion will be carried, its objectives will not be lost on the people of Sandwell. It is just the first in a number of steps the BNP has to take in order to win our country back for our people. But make no mistake about it, we have started that process, and our people are well aware and increasingly receptive to our message.

The BBC and New Labour alike might try to pretend that we do not exist, but after the events of last month their reflective roles in being entrusted to represent British public opinion are looking increasingly untenable.

A British future for your children! Is that worth 64p a day?

The BNP has 16 Council seats nationwide and is growing like never before. But to really make the most of our potential in the regular round of council, London Assembly, Mayoral and European elections next year we urgently need to increase the number of staff members working for the party. At the moment the Staff Support Fund pays the wages of 29 professional and part-time members of staff working solely to promote the BNP across the United Kingdom. They all do an incredible job but they need support as quickly as possible to cope with the party's rapid expansion.

You can help make this possible by making a regular investment of just 64p a day to help the BNP secure a future for British children. To help the BNP help you please telephone National Treasurer John Brayshaw on 08707 515296 for a Standing Order form. All enquiries will be treated in the strictest confidence.

Live a little more for your nation

In my usual cowardly fashion I avoided reading Nick Griffin's article How We Can Gain a £1 Million Subsidy until I had read everything else in the June issue. Reluctantly, I then went back to it hoping that his appeal for money and activity didn't apply to me: that it was something I could think about tomorrow when all the pressing tasks of living were done and when I had added up my pennies.

Of course, after reading it the constant patriot kicked in and reminded me that this was the second national crisis that some of us had faced in our long lives. The first was September 3rd, 1939 when we declared war on Germany; when we were promised danger and deprivation – and got it. The greatest deprivation was the call to arms, for ourselves, our loved ones and the best of our breed. We accepted our "call-up" papers, brave and smiling outside but often bleak inside. For hundreds of thousands they became a death certificate, but we thought we were saving our country and future generations for freedom: a freedom that has now become so grotesque as a result of the old parties' lack of interest, lack of will, in defending it.

So come on you Nationalists, your Party is not asking you to die for your country, or even to sign for your "call-up" papers, only to live a little less for yourselves and a little more for your nation. Some can do more and some less, but we will still be here for our families, friends and the nation.

Why California is bankrupt

The State of California is bankrupt and in the process of shutting down its colleges, state-funded nursing homes, and other government services. This month (August) it is contemplating firing as many as 30,000 state employees as a preliminary move.

California has been bankrupted by its large Mexican immigrant population, who have made such intense demands on social services. As a result the total State budget shortfall this year alone is estimated at $38 billion. Even if it were to enact a 100 per cent tax and confiscate all goods in the state, it would be unlikely to be able to pay the police to carry out the law. And even if it did it would be unlikely to be able to collect enough revenue in time to avoid insolvency.

While the liberal caucus Democrat politicians, and other public officials bribed with their money, encouraged open borders immigration and denounced any attempt to limit welfare programs as "racist", two trends emerged. First, productive whites fled the state, abandoning it to the incoming migrants, who were generally unemployed or undocumented, and thus did not pay taxes. Second, the demands for social services from the alien racial group – now close to a majority – so exceeded the total productive wealth of the white population that the state's entire economy has collapsed.

California is only the latest state to face insolvency. Several other US states have stopped paying their employees and stopped issuing tax refund checks because their bank accounts have been completely depleted.

The collapse of the Californian economy comes at a good time (sooner rather than later) for addressing the issue of parasitism by many immigrants. Mexico ejects the poorest and least productive elements of its population into the United States as a social safety valve for its own failed economy. It then encourages Mexican nationalism and racial hostility that causes productive whites to leave affected areas.

Ultimate Farce

The ITV channel is running a drama series titled Ultimate Force. It depicts a very unlikely bunch of individuals as 'special forces' engaged in covert operations against equally unlikely villains. A recent episode concerned youthful suicide bombers who chose to destroy a sleazy dance-hall and a grotty little café. Their actions were supposedly directed by an elderly man who had written a 'right wing' book (not me! – Editor). Scenes included this elderly man and a young girl tied to chairs while being harangued and beaten up by members of this ultimate farce outfit, one of them a spectacularly ugly negro. The ending scenes featured a kindly and courageous black schoolteacher pleading with a boyish suicide bomber to spare the children in his classroom, while swarms of heavily armed forces surrounded the place.

ITV is clearly sticking by the Hollywood policy that nobody loses money by underestimating the public's intelligence. It is obvious viewers of this programme were not supposed to reflect that:

- 1.The only suicide bombers are Muslim extremists.
- 2.What makes grungy dance-halls and cafes 'right wing' targets worth dying for?
- 3.Outside of Africa, who would employ a negro in 'undercover' operations against white people?
- 4.Aren't the viewers supposed to assume that only fascists beat up helpless people tied to chairs?

As Batman would doubtless say: "Good thinking, Robin".

Rhodesia given to a savage

May I ask if Lord Carrington will ever explain to a suspicious world just why he gave Rhodesia to a savage, when the election was won by a reasonable and Christian African?

It is impossible that Lord Carrion Crow did not know what he was doing.

Further, do any of your readers know the answer to another important question of our age that was asked by Dr David Starkey just before his Talk Radio programme ended? Namely:

"What was the secret deal done by Tony Blair and Rupert Murdoch?"

NUJ's Code of 'Misconduct'

Having read the article about the NUJ's code of conduct in May's Identity, I think it would be a good idea to include part of the article in some of the Party's literature. The wording could be something on the lines of:

"Have you wondered why the press rarely, if ever, print anything positive about the BNP? Or why sections of the media seem intent on labelling the Party with false names and false descriptions?"

"Well, journalists are bound by the NUJ's code of conduct (in reality a code of misconduct) which prohibits them from portraying Nationalist parties and policies in a positive way.

"For more information please visit the BNP website..."

This could be a useful tool that should be used.

Fraud and Postal Voting

The BNP ought to be aware of the opportunity for fraud that exists in the new 'Postal Voting' system.

The occupier of a house can put a number of non-existent names on the Registration Form that is issued each October. At election time each name will receive a voting form through the post. The occupier can put a cross on each and return the forms.

It is not the job of the Electoral Registration Officer to investigate whether each name is a British Citizen, a Commonwealth Citizen, an Irish Citizen, or even exists. One would imagine that the police have too much to do to knock on doors checking up on the Voters Lists.

Let's stick to the old routine where each voter has to appear at the Polling Station in person (and prove he or she can speak English).

Blair on Europe – then and now

The first time Blair ran for MP was 1982 in Beaconsfield. At that election he said in a leaflet: "Above all, the EEC takes away Britain's freedom to follow economic policies we need." During the same election he wrote in the local South Bucks Observer: "I support withdrawal from the EEC (certainly unless the most fundamental changes are effected)."

By May 1995 he was saying: "I fought to persuade my party to become a party of Europe ... I have no doubt at all that the future of my country is in being at the heart of Europe."

Did he previously have a brain in working order, or was he got at?

You can't discriminate against whites

Organisations such as the Racial Equality Commission are overwhelmingly non-white. Could this paradoxically be discrimination itself against whites? Do they have a quota of whites on the Commission as by law?

I ask as a white who took his case of discrimination to their commission only to have it sneered at by the case officer and to be informed that they only dealt with real cases of discrimination. I tried to find out if my human rights had been violated by this commission only to hit a wall of incomprehensible jargon. Therefore, can I ask if there is a body that deals with such matters, or an A to Z of human rights complaints couched in plain English for people like me who feel we are being put upon and being discriminated against by this government and its crony organisations.

The BBC, for instance, is without doubt an extreme left-wing organisation yet I, who do not think their way, have to pay for its 24 hours a day propaganda, even though I do not use its service! Surely this is an infringement of my human rights.

Actually doing something about asylum seekers

Immediately following the BNP's Council Election victories in May, the BBC and other TV news programmes said that something needed "to be seen to be done" about immigration basically "to stop voters turning to the 'extreme right'"

Herein lies the crux of the matter. To be seen to be doing something is a lot different to actually doing something. New members and supporters of the BNP should not be deluded or influenced by the rhetoric and sudden supposed concern of the politicians about asylum and immigration. The career politicians couldn't care less about how many asylum seekers or illegal immigrants enter the country; if they did they could have done something about it years ago.

What they are worried about is the democratic process actually working for a change and the BNP gaining more council seats and ultimately parliamentary representatives, thereby losing them – the career politicians – their highly paid jobs.

How to pass your 12 Plus

Last year there were not many passes for the 12 plus exams in Aylesbury. There was a small number on the border line but the families declined to appeal – except for an Asian family who used the excuse that their son was hampered due to English being his second language. His appeal was successful and he was granted a pass!

Asylum scroungers and Huguenots

In his article in the June issue John Maddox makes fair reference to the Huguenots who came here in the 17th century (my paternal grandmother was of Huguenot descent – Editor).

They were mostly skilled people and came here with a culture of hard work and enterprise. They expected nothing but the results of their own efforts, and they respected our laws on behaviour. The contrast with the immigrants we are now getting could not be greater and surely blows the argument out of the water that "this country has always benefited from immigration in the past, so it must be a good thing now".

To compare the Huguenots with what is happening today is not comparing like with like in any way whatsoever.

Multiracialism is Failing Education

A report by BNP National Press Officer Dr Phil Edwards

Black scholastic underachievement is now so acute that 2500 attended a recent conference on the subject

In the capital, only 15% of African-Caribbean boys on free school meals (an indicator of poverty) gained 5 or more A to C GCSEs as against an average for all boys of 26%. 40% of Bangladeshi boys on free school meals gained good grades, out-performing even the African-Caribbean boys who were not on free school meals. Mayor Livingstone drew attention to the fact that one third of the pupils in London were black and he appealed to London schools and teacher unions to follow the example of the police after the Stephen Lawrence enquiry by admitting publicly that schools had a problem of "institutional racism" and were failing black pupils. In other words, ignore the mass of scientific evidence showing average lower black IQ and shift the blame to someone else — "racist" white British society. Dr Walter Massey, President of Morehouse College (Atlanta, USA) said that in America black males were 20% of the population but 60% of the prison population, and 38% of black males were involved in gangs.

Stephen Twigg, parliamentary undersecretary of state for schools, told the conference that only 7% of black pupils in Hackney attained 5+ A-C, and that black pupils were three times more likely to be expelled compared to white pupils. He went on to say that schools would have to explain this discrimination; so once again, the blame has to be shifted onto the teachers and the wider "white racist" British society.

MULTIRACIAL BRAINWASHING

One way of apportioning blame is through a barrage of political correctness and multiracial brainwashing of our children being provided by the Qualifications Curriculum Authority (QCA) in the form of "Respect for all: valuing diversity and challenging racism through the [school] curriculum". The QCA is part of the Department of Education and the "Respect for all" nonsense originated in the Orwellian sounding "Equality Unit" where the two people I spoke to were, apart from being black, insistent that their project was strictly voluntary, and teachers were not obliged to include it in their classes. I checked with my local (almost 100% White) Midlands comprehensive, and yes, of course, they would include it. How many teachers would dare not to in this current climate of fear and intimidation?

Valuing the enforced diversity that is now destroying the peace and tranquillity of British society must be quite a challenge for teachers, so it is not surprising they have little time left to teach children how to spell or add up. Amazingly, the QCA manages to introduce the "valuing of diversity and challenging racism" into science and maths teaching. They recommend, "using materials [in science] that reflect social and cultural diversity and provide positive images of race, gender and disability". So, in one school containing children from "traditional Traveller backgrounds" (gypsies to you and me), materials science was covered by investigating the construction of a typical gypsy caravan. Another school, an inner-city primary with a high proportion of children from "a mix of ethnic minorities" studied the development of the electric lamp with the aim "to study the work of male, female, European and non-European scientists, so that the contributions to science of both genders and all races is acknowledged and appreciated". It seems now that the teaching of science should be about whether the scientist was a man or woman, Black or White, rather than the scientific method and learning to think in logical patterns and develop theories.

An even more sinister piece of brainwashing is to be found in the maths section — the example concerned an inner city comprehensive with 1371 pupils, 75% of them from minority ethnic groups, and where "a strong anti-racism policy influences the teaching of all subjects" (readers should consider what sort of adults these children will become in just a few years time).

'Handling data' provides considerable scope for raising multicultural, anti-racist awareness" Pupils drew graphs based on life expectancy and infant mortality rates in Third World countries and were left to ponder the unanswered question "What would happen if we had data about countries from Western Europe?" Calculations were made about the average area of accommodation available per person for living in South Africa and comparisons made between the Black population and the White population. "The mathematics cannot be challenged, but the questions that follow from such results may address the issues of racism."

BLACKS ON HADRIAN'S WALL

There's plenty more: "Who are the British" (to reinforce understanding of diversity and showing black soldiers on Hadrian's Wall). "The inheritance of skin colour" with the help of a worksheet bearing the photos of children who have a black mother and a white father.

"Racism in football" was particularly creepy, designed to rob children of their natural self-preservation instinct and wariness of foreigners by assessing the reaction to Sven-Goran Eriksson's appointment as manager of the England football team. Many people working within the sport and fans contacting phone-in programme expressed their concerns about a "Foreigner" managing the team. In the light of this pupils were asked to comment on questions like "Nationalism is...", "Prejudice is...", "Discrimination is...?" Readers may draw their own conclusions about the sort of answers necessary to gain good marks.

Interestingly, a glance at the QCA website shows that all of their top 11 executives and managers are White as are all 10 of the board members. (<http://www.qca.org.uk>)

...a truly inspirational CD that promises to give the 'Red White and Blue' ballads CD a run for its money

Professionally mastered and produced. Carl Klang's voice will appeal to male, female, old and young alike. He makes his position pretty clear on many of the social and political issues of the day. "Blinded by the lies", the opening track sets the stage with an enchanting musical analysis of those who pull the strings and set the agenda without anyone really noticing their sleight of hand. "Seventeen Little Children" may not mean much for us this side of the Atlantic, but the US Federal storming of the compound at Waco in 1993 resulting in the murder of 74 US citizens opened the minds of many Americans about the real nature of the Government in the "Land of the Free". There is a song to honour Randy Weaver, a US citizen who wanted to bring his kids up away from the mayhem of Government schools. His wife and young family were murdered by an army of 400 US marshalls. All 17 of his tracks are political, some are amusing, others will doubtless raise the blood pressure as one listens to the injustices carried out against American patriots, families and Viet-vets.

A necessary addition to your CD collection.

EDITOR'S POLITICAL MEMOIRS

Excalibur is stocking copies of John Bean's autobiography Many Shades of Black. This is highly recommended to those readers who would like to know the history of the radical right in post-war Britain and those who first led the campaign opposing the open door policy on immigration. It also shows where some of them went wrong, which has been listened to by today's BNP.

"Another boring book of some old man's memoirs" it is not! As regular Identity readers would expect, John Bean writes with directness and a great sense of humour.

£9.45 including p & p from Excalibur, PO Box 116, Leeds LS27 9WW.
